This doctoral thesis aims to conduct an in-depth analysis of the role of the state in a competitive economy, with a specific focus on Romania's evolution from a centralized socialist system to a contemporary market economy. The research explores how state intervention can be optimized to promote sustainable economic development, reduce social and regional inequalities, and strengthen a market economy based on real competition and innovation.

Chapter I introduces the research framework by defining the topic, its relevance, research objectives, hypotheses, and methodology. The methodological approach combines in-depth documentation, institutional analysis, and comparative studies with other European models, highlighting both theoretical and practical dimensions.

Chapter II presents the theoretical foundations, examining the concept, typologies, and functions of the state, as well as classical and modern theories regarding the state-economy relationship. The chapter details the principles and mechanisms of the competitive economy, contrasting minimal state models with interventionist approaches aimed at market regulation and correction of market failures.

Chapter III analyzes the evolution of the state's role in Romania, from the centralized socialist economy to the post-1989 transition to a market economy. It discusses major reforms such as privatization, deregulation, and price liberalization, and reviews the development of a legal and institutional framework to support a competitive market, emphasizing implementation challenges.

Chapter V focuses on the challenges and dysfunctions in state intervention, including bureaucratic inefficiency, institutional capture, corruption, and lack of transparency. The chapter also addresses the failure of state action in reducing inequalities and its limited capacity to foster competition and innovation, thus hindering long-term economic competitiveness.

In response, Chapter VI argues for a redefinition of the state's role in the current socio-economic context. It examines European and global trends in governance and state involvement, and presents good governance models (e.g., transparency, accountability, citizen participation). The chapter proposes concrete public policy recommendations aimed at institutional reform, promoting inclusive development and rebalancing the state–market–citizen relationship in Romania.

Finally, Chapter VII presents the main conclusions, validates or refutes the initial hypotheses, and outlines the thesis's original theoretical and practical contributions. The study's limitations are acknowledged, and future research directions are suggested to further support effective and adaptable public policies in both the Romanian and broader European context.
